2022 is a year to be proud of and commemorate our journal reaching its 100th volume almost without interruption and ten years under its new name, Botanical Sciences. Therefore, as Editor-in-Chief, I send my congratulations to the entire botanical scientific community and, in particular, to our excellent editorial team (reviewers, section editors, editorial manager, and editorial assistant). Thanks to everyone who has been able to reach this volume and bring Botanical Sciences to the route of the online publication, which is as complex as the printed one, but with different challenges. Among our goals are to continue being one of the best journals in Latin American Botany, increase our impact factor, reduce the times between reception and acceptance, and increase the immediacy index with our online first section. These and other activities of the editorial team will be reflected little by little on our home page.

We thank the National Autonomous University of Mexico for its constant economic support through the Institutional Development Secretariat, the National Council of Science and Technology for its support during the change to the OJS System, and the Botanical Society of Mexico for being the front that opens the way for its communication medium to continue.

Teresa Terrazas
Editor in Chief